Psychoanalysis & Art - a journey into the creative process

We believe that the Coronavirus crisis is affecting more than our physical health and social interactions: it is also affecting our cultural life. It increases primitive fears, causes social withdrawal and hinders people's ability to engage and relate in a transitional, common playground. Human contact, psychical as well as physical, that usually nurtures life, may now trigger fears and persecutory anxieties.
Our bodies no longer move much and have to reduce their expressiveness; minds and relationships suffer from this deprivation. The closure of cinemas, theaters, squares, children's playgrounds, schools, psychoanalytic centers, etc. may cause and reproduce at the same time both individual and collective cumulative trauma.

In the encounter with the uncanny, both, psychoanalysis and art endeavors to find ways to represent the experience. Psychoanalysis meets the art in a space where both endeavors to find transformative potential. Looking inward and outward, they are trying to find ways of expressing their encounter with the unknown; finding expression and interpretation for what was experienced as unrepresented.
The very nature of art and psychoanalysis is evolutionary because it is constantly questioning the states of being and, in turn, it is questioned by them. In this way, both psychoanalysis and art are inherently engaged with the process of how transformation happens. In the relational field, artistic and analytic creative process finds common ground, bringing emotion into play, and thereby its potential to become thinkable.

G.Pellizzari, kind permission of the Milanese Center of Psychoanalysis

IPSO offers a dialogical platform to psychoanalysts and artists to reflect upon the nature of creative processes within the context of contemporary reality. 6 webinars covering 6 different time zones, connecting candidates, psychoanalysts, artists and a wider audience from the 5 continents, in a one-day virtual trip around the world.

Our aim is to make a journey through the creative process. We propose not only to discuss the meaning of creativity, but also to meet within a creative encounter for all, as a vaccine for the mind.

Dylan Lewis is a South African artist who has emerged as one of the foremost figures in contemporary sculpture. Lewis's primary inspiration is wilderness. At one level his bronze sculptures celebrate the power and movement of Africa's life forms; at another the textures he creates speak of the continent's primeval, rugged landscapes and their ancient rhythms. In recent years, he has used the human figure to explore our relationship with our inner wilderness. His international career spans two decades and includes exhibitions in Paris, Sydney, Toronto, Houston and San Francisco, as well as numerous one-man exhibitions in London, where he is among the few living artists to have held solo auctions at Christie's London.

Roberto Basile. I am an art photographer. By profession, I am a psychoanalyst. I am based in Milan and I am 64 years old. I tend to take black and white pictures, but I turn to color whenever I happen to see color as one of the meaningful "characters" present in an image. Photography and psychoanalysis are actually closer than one would think at first sight. In fact, sometimes the same techniques are used, such as being open to feelings; being interested in detail; ability to develop visions that reorganize reality in an original new way; getting involved in a situation. In order to take a photograph, I must be alone and get into a dreamy state which allows me to see things that were not there before.
Photography and psychoanalysis have been present in my life since childhood. I have always had a camera in my hand. I took pictures even without any film in the camera: just for the sake of framing and shooting. But then one day of too many years ago I left for India with a dozen black and white films in my backpack, never to stop. And on the other hand, from an early age I used to observe people: I was attracted above all by those who seemed to me to put their intimacy, their pain and originality at the center of their lives and existential goals. Those who knew how to contemplate. Some of my photographic works may be seen here: www.robertobasilephoto.eu

Terrance McLarnan is an artist, poet and psychoanalyst (in that order). He studied photography at the Minneapolis College of Art and Design and has produced black and white photographs for over 40 years.
